Geometry AutoCAD offers a number of ways to model geometry. Geometry may be created using the 3D modeler. A 2D sketch is saved to a datum (default 2D sketch) and then moved to another datum (for example, the paper is moved from the center of the 2D sketch to the top left of the paper to create an orthographic view). User-created drawing objects can be imported into the 3D modeler and 3D geometry objects can be created directly from these objects. In addition, there are several types of geometry in AutoCAD. First, there is straight-edge and arc geometry: Straight edges are drawn from the 3D cursor, which can be moved by the hand or with an object such as an alignment, along the x, y, and z axes. Arc geometry is constructed by the interior angle of a 3D segment. Another type of geometry is wireframe (solid or surface) geometry. This is created by selecting a segment and drawing the line in the direction of the segment or by drawing lines in any direction. Any number of lines or arcs can be added. A third type of geometry is Bézier curves. The Bézier curve is any curve made with 3 or more control points. A Bézier curve can be converted into any other type of geometry by a series of click-and-drag operations. For example, a 3D spline curve can be converted into a Bezier curve, a Bézier curve can be converted into an arc, and an arc can be converted into a spline. A fourth type of geometry is profile geometry. A profile is the profile or contour line of a surface. The profile is made by selecting a contour line or Bézier curve and clicking the Add Profile tool (added in AutoCAD LT 2011). The profile line can be dragged to an exact position on the 3D model. A profile line can be deleted by right-clicking on it and selecting Delete Profile. The fifth type of geometry is a surfacing feature. Surface features are created by selecting a point, drawing a line, and clicking on the Surface Feature tool. Surfacing features can be scaled, rotated, and shifted. A sixth type of geometry is a solid object. A solid is a region within the drawing area of a 3D model. The seventh type of geometry is a fitted object. ca3bfb1094
