A growing number of states are exploring the financial and economic effects of legalizing marijuana. The movement to legalize marijuana in the U.S. has grown steadily over the last decade, following President Obama's recent statement that the federal government should allow states to decide whether to legalize the drug and Washington and Colorado to experiment with legalization in recent years. But a growing number of states are exploring the financial and economic effects of legalizing marijuana. With the federal government's recent comments casting doubt on a federal crackdown on states that have legalized marijuana, states with medical marijuana programs are wondering whether they can safely proceed without federal approval. In January, Washington became the first state to vote to legalize recreational use of the drug through a voter initiative. Legislation was drafted and passed in two years by the Washington state government despite vocal opposition from the federal government. Supporters of Washington's legalization initiative say the state should be permitted to pursue this decision on its own and with no need for the federal government to back it up. Colorado voters approved a similar ballot measure in 2012, and a similar bill passed in Oregon in November. The first retail sales of marijuana are planned to begin in both states in July. Now, a number of other states are following Washington's lead in considering legalization. Colorado is set to hold its first vote on marijuana in November. The momentum toward legalization is growing, but the federal government's recent comments -- in which Attorney General Eric Holder said the Justice Department will defer to state and local authorities on whether to enforce federal marijuana laws, as long as those authorities don't undermine the enforcement priorities of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration -- have many lawmakers worried about what this will mean for their programs. "We are here now to ask the nation to join us in the pursuit of justice, equality, and a brighter future for our children," former Colorado Rep. and State Representative Tom Massey told CNN. "We need to stop throwing the business of Washington under the bus. The administration is going to take us apart for doing nothing more than trying to keep our children safe." In many states, such as Colorado, Washington, Oregon, and Alaska, marijuana is federally legal for medicinal purposes. Although the
