HIV is a major human retrovirus, responsible for AIDS. It is also the first human RNA virus discovered and is the most closely studied of the RNA viruses. The immediate aims are to obtain a better understanding of the highly conserved processes of DNA- dependent RNA synthesis in infected cells (reverse transcription and RNA packaging). The five complementary aims provide new insights on (1) the mechanism(s) of mutagenesis in a process thought to be error-free, (2) the interactions of viral and host nucleic acid-binding proteins, (3) the regulation of viral RNA synthesis and its implications for disease development, (4) the mechanism of the RNase H activity of the viral

RTs, and (5) the recognition of RNA by the RTs, gp41, and an RNA packaging signal. A better understanding of the molecular mechanisms of replication and pathogenesis of this model virus will provide a basis for understanding the replication of other RNA viruses. The proposed research is highly significant, since it addresses fundamental questions that are not currently addressed, largely as a result of insufficient tools, and because HIV has emerged as a major threat to human health.
