of the Chugach Mountains The Arelite Core of the Chugach Mountains is located in the foothills of the Chugach Mountains of Alaska, approximately west-southwest of the town of Chugach, and consists of long ridge complexes and a number of tributaries. The Arelite Core (Arelite is an Inupiat word for ridge) lies adjacent to the west to the Arelite Mountains and the Beluga Plains and is separated from the Chugach Mountains by the short Beluga Ridge. The elevation of the Arelite Core varies from, averaging around in the lowest part of the mountains. The Arelite Core has a rugged and heavily glaciated surface, with large talus fields, high talus-ridge fields, and landslides. The topographic pattern resembles that of other mountainous areas of Alaska but it is characterized by the large glaciated areas. The Arelite Core formed during the Early Pleistocene glaciation and includes three major glacial units ranging in age from 1.9 to 1.0 Ma: the Arelite Vieux Glacié, the Arelite Embryo Glacié, and the Arelite Range Glacié. The Arelite Vieux Glacié is the youngest and represents the most recent glacial activity in the region. Most of the glaciers originate on the slopes of the Arelite Core and subsequently moved down the mountains until they reached the valley. The Arelite Core is separated into 15 separate named topographic areas. These areas are variably glaciated and covered in numerous glacial lakes; the number of lakes ranges from 3-14. Unlike the Beluga Plains and Beluga Highlands to the east of the Arelite Core, the current glaciers in the Arelite Core were initiated during the Last Glacial Maximum (26-19,000 years ago). Glacial activity halted in the Arelite Core around 10,000-14,000 years ago, after which scoured valley bottoms were exposed and erosion accelerated. Topography The Arelite Core is located in the Chugach Mountains, which are part of the Aleutian Range. The Chugach Mountains rise from a plateau and form a series of basins and valleys. Their highest points are peaks in range, some averaging around. The Arelite Core is adjacent to the west to the Arelite Mountains and the Beluga Plains and is separated from
