We can make a more fluid user experience with tessellation. Render-to-Bitmap: Currently, we are adding higher precision control over the rendering. Currently, we have very limited control for rendering to tessellation buffer. With this, we can now support for a future complete render-to-bitmap. Slideshows and panoramas. They're exciting, blowing up the frame, and so on. Why else would we want them? But, to get them, we need a pretty dark room. We don't want to expose the highlights too soon if we can't see a problem. A full-frame matted print will also have to be created. With negatives and a single-frame positive (as a "negative"), we're halfway there. To get the best possible print, we need to do the whole hog. We flip to slides, and frame the magic. Capturing the same shot with the same lighting will continue to make sure that our black-and-white print follows the curve of our slides. I will keep track of a variety of changes, including a few new view modes for making critical adjustments to images. For my own files, I use the show preview option in the application, along with a big monitor. For images that are to be archived, I perform all my basic image adjustments on a Wacom tablet instead. My workflow is directly tied into my tablet, so I use programs that I know work well with the setup. Photoshop is one such tool. For those who might be interested in previewing in the LCD from their camera, I've been able to get 10-bit color to display off a Canon 5D Mark IV. But, I can hardly believe it has run in the preview and export modes. Blackening blues, and making whites look natural could be here.
