Motivational interviewing can help increase engagement in primary care. The Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act included a provision to ensure the promotion of preventive services, including physical activity, among patients. Yet, to date, there are few screening programs to assess patients' physical activity levels. To determine whether motivational interviewing (MI) can increase the likelihood of reporting increased physical activity among primary care patients and to assess the feasibility of adding MI screening to standard medical visits. As part of a feasibility trial of MI screening, a survey was administered in 4 primary care clinics (n = 332). After 1 month, respondents completed a brief questionnaire about increased physical activity. The following data were assessed: characteristics of patients receiving the survey; comparisons between survey respondents and nonrespondents; and associations of survey response and BMI as calculated from self-reported height and weight. Most patients were female, and the majority (68%) were white. About half of patients had increased physical activity. Respondents were more likely to report increased physical activity than nonrespondents (44.5% vs 17.2%; P 79a2804d6b
