The problem with Aperture, though, is that it is still a very photo-centric application. That is, it really only excels at managing your library of photos, and not much else. So, if you need to edit one or two other aspects of a photo, you are pretty much out of luck. Photoshop is built to do that. Lightroom, on the other hand, is built as a library of tools capable of handling a multitude of tasks. And because of that it can edit almost anything in your photo, save for printing or for web use. It also comes as a free download and as a standalone, purchase-only application. In conclusion, I will suggest that if you are looking at a few specific features that will push the boundaries of what you can achieve with Photoshop, and you feel happy looking at the price tag, go for Lightroom. But if you want the best of all possible worlds, and if you do not mind a different software application, then by all means, Aperture is worth a test drive. If you have not yet seen the announcement of Lightroom 5.1, there has been no time like the present for you to upgrade to this version as soon as possible. After all, the latest update to Lightroom can be downloaded from the Adobe website. This update is free for eligible customers. PC or Mac, image-editing software is essential to modern life. Mac users say they would rather use Photoshop, the Mac version of an app I wrote about last year, but PC users win because they can access software on their favorite
