Washing and cleaning machines are employed in particular in private households for the washing of household goods, such as dishware, clothing, and the like. In general, a dishwasher has a washing drum, which in a first step holds and washes the dishes, whereupon they are sprayed with water during a subsequent rinsing step. Dishwashers or handwashing machines, as they are also commonly called, may be equipped with a program device, which, depending on user input, usually by means of a selection device, enables the user to define a washing and/or cleaning program. With the aid of a control unit, the washing and/or cleaning program is stored in the appliance memory of the washing and cleaning machine, and initiated when the appliance is switched on. The program device usually uses a liquid crystal display as a display for the selection of parameters such as washing program and/or rinsing program. Depending on the respective washing program, the user may frequently adjust the program device and also the characteristics of the washing process, for example the temperature of the wash liquor, the agitation of the washing tub or of the wash basket, the times at which the washing baskets are emptied from the washing tub, or the like. The user may frequently also have to adjust the respective washing program on the basis of instructions, so as to enable him or her to operate the washing machine in a reliable fashion. As a rule, these instructions have to be set manually, so that the instructions have to be input by the user or set by him or her by means of the 79a2804d6b
