Review of the use of anti-angiogenic drugs and the future of cancer treatment. There are two major types of solid tumors: those in which a rich blood supply is vital for the growth of cancer cells, and those in which the blood supply is reduced or eliminated by the cancer cells. Angiogenesis inhibitors target the proliferation of blood vessels in tumor tissue. Most anticancer drugs target the cancer cells directly. In contrast, anti-angiogenic therapy is believed to target the blood vessels in tumor tissue, as they are more accessible to drugs. The vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) family of growth factors is an important regulator of tumor angiogenesis, and the target of most clinically relevant angiogenesis inhibitors. Clinical trials have established the effectiveness of bevacizumab, a monoclonal antibody against VEGF-A, as a first-line treatment of metastatic colorectal and non-small-cell lung cancer. The combination of bevacizumab and irinotecan is a promising treatment for metastatic colorectal cancer. More recently, several new oral drugs have been developed. The anti-VEGFs have a number of different mechanisms of action, and do not show cross-resistance to many other drugs. The approval of these drugs is expected to improve the prognosis of many types of cancer. The future of anti-angiogenic therapy includes using anti-angiogenic drugs to target tumor cells and using anti-angiogenic drugs in combination with chemotherapy or other anti-cancer drugs.<sup>3</sup> With the base to our castles already made, we're now ready to continue.
