Lightroom 6 adds some new features as expected. It is a much better version compared to Lightroom 5. However, I found that sometimes it is confuse on what the number next to the number of the photo is, which what the Preferences says. The latest update of Lightroom is a great upgrade, but it is not perfect. It is very frustrating that you cannot add more number to the photos that have been loaded on your computer. This is another thing that I wish they can fix.

What I'm loving in Lightroom 6 is the ability to export icons, a feature that has been talked about for a while now. I can't wait to see how my annual newsletters will come to life when I import these extras into a template. It's a creative little tool that will make digital life a little easier in the future.

I found myself needing more control over the Lens Correction and Metering options, so I did a bit of tinkering to see if I could tweak a few things. I do wish that I could make the correction blend zones invisible. I only want to show the parts that have been corrected. I also wish that the Channels and Bands options had more to them. I wish it had a way to separate the Chinese characters from all of the English ones. Also, I wish there was a way to reverse the colors and make the icons and wells more visible.

Overall, Lightroom 6 is a fantastic update that is sure to keep Apple's image management tool a huge player in the industry. It does feel like the program has some room for improvement and it also seems like a little bit more could have been done to make a smoother process when importing photos.
