The truth is that there are 1,500 plus species of snakes. It's a lot. Some of them are venomous and you'd be well advised to keep away from them. So what then should you do if you encounter a viper and you are not sure whether you can kill it? We have already said that vipers are old and have relatively little venom. It is easy to see how they get their name. Vipers have a small head. In fact, the average head of a viper is the size of a human thumb. The large head means that they cannot swallow very much prey. It is also from the tip of the small head that the viper can inject its venom. In order to be able to inject venom, the viper must have its eyes in front of the body. On each side of the snake's head, there are two pits. These pits are used to suck the prey's blood. In addition, the viper has something called his fangs. These fangs are used to grab the prey's flesh. The viper is also equipped with a forked tongue. In this case, the forked tongue used to store the prey's blood. And lastly, in order to ensure that the viper's prey won't flee, it also has a special noise called his rattle. Let's take a closer look at the main parts of the viper's body. Apart from the head and the fangs, the viper has a pair of legs. These legs are very thick and look like a stumpy little frog. In addition, the viper's tail is very long and thin. The viper also has a pair of eyes at the back of the head. These eyes are used to see its prey.

Finally, the viper has a pair of lungs. Each of these lungs has a tiny opening. Apart from the lungs, there is also a pair of arteries that connect the lungs. These arteries are used to get oxygen from the lungs. When we talk about the rest of the viper's anatomy, we mean its spine and its body. The spine is very long. The viper's spine is hard and is divided into three sections. The first section is the upper spine. This section is very hard and can withstand a lot of pressure. The second section of the spine is the middle spine. This section is also hard and it is not as
