One thing I do like about Photoshop is the increased number of dots per inch (DPI) that it offers. Not only am I using a computer monitor and printer at a higher resolution, but I'm using a large atlas map sheet which is printed by a desktop laser printer. It's great to be able to enlarge the print sheet to over a 1000% to make sure there are no errors in the map.

The biggest thing I missed was the Smart Tones feature. I love the old Smart Tones feature, which basically lightens or darkens the photo based on color and tone ranges. Most of us, unfortunately, live in a world of inkjet printers, so having the capability to "preview" the image as different inkjet settings won't be too helpful. But Smart Tone provides that capability.

I also love the new dynamic vector layer - it reduces the time it takes to resize and edit greatly. I was able to make significant changes to my photos and be back within minutes, whereas before it was hours.

But what I really need is more determination and a good dose of discipline in providing just a little bit of effort in the right direction. I'm just beginning to think about getting my eyes back in focus. I know, "right direction". A simple problem, but not one that an advanced user can get around. But it will take a little more time for it to click.

There are a number of new controls—one of the most welcome being the new Long Exposure Noise Reduction tool—that provide some great-looking effects. There's also a new Preset Manager, including 12 Tutorials with Over 80 Presets; a Precision tool; and a new Lens blur tool.
